

Chapter 4: Questions

1. What matters most to you right now in your life?

What are your current priorities? Is it making money, advancing your career, spending time with family, improving your health, finding a relationship, personal growth, or something else entirely? Be specific about what's driving your decisions and where you're putting most of your focus and energy.

2. How have you been feeling about your life overall in recent months?

Optimistic, stuck, frustrated, content, etc. What's contributing to these feelings? Are you in a good place mentally and emotionally, or going through a rough patch? What aspects of your life are working well, and what feels challenging or disappointing right now?

3. If you were to describe the future version of yourself who has already achieved everything you want, what skills, knowledge and qualities does this future self have?

How do they think, act, and carry themselves? Be specific about the gaps between current you and future you — the skills, knowledge, and qualities they have that you're still missing.

4. What are this future self's defining character traits, and how would others describe their personality and approach to life?

Select a total of 5 character traits.

5. What specific fears, doubts, habits, commitments and limiting beliefs are holding you back from becoming the person you admire and dream of being?

Write down the actual thoughts that stop you before you even try — "People like me don't..." or "I'm not smart enough to..." Then think about what you're clinging to that's actually keeping you small: a job that pays the bills but kills your soul, relationships that don't support your growth, or habits that feel safe but limit your potential. Sometimes what feels like security is actually a prison.

6. Looking at the people you admire, can you see how your current identity might conflict with what you need to become to achieve your dreams?

Explain the internal conflicts you notice between who you are now and who you need to become.

7. What's the single biggest thing that must change for you to bridge the gap between who you are now and your future self?

If you could change one fundamental thing about how you think, feel, or act, what would create the biggest transformation? This is usually something internal - a core belief, deep fear, or pattern that's running everything else. What's the keystone change that would unlock everything else?

8. What would you regret most if you looked back 3-5 years from now and hadn't accomplished?

What would feel like a genuine waste of your potential? If you're still in the same place 3-5 years from now, what would hurt the most about that? This fear of regret shows what matters most to you.
